

What Are the Costs of Closing on a Home? Buyers and Sellers Want to Know

This is an article best read at <http://RealEstateToday.substack.com>, where the buyer and seller settlement statements at right appear much larger on your computer screen. I have anonymized the actual closing statements from a property I sold for $698,000 this year which had an HOA, a seller loan to pay off, and a buyer loan to fund. That covers most of the expenses that a buyer or seller might encounter when closing on a home sale or purchase.

taxes plus some of the current year's taxes deducted from your proceeds.

Your lender has probably been escrowing for next year's property tax bill (and insurance renewal), but that escrow can't be credited on your closing. You'll pay for the property taxes at closing and get a refund of your escrow balance from your lender 30 days or so after closing.

On this seller's settlement statement, the HOA dues are also pro-rated to the date of closing, and, since the closing was on the 30th of August, the statement refunds two days' worth of HOA dues, which the seller had paid on August 1st.

The biggest deductions for the seller (other than property taxes) are the real estate commissions and the title insurance policy. The purchase contract specifies whether the buyer or seller will pay for the buyer agent's commission and the owner's title insurance, but it is still common for the seller to pay both agents' commissions plus the title policy, as in this case.

There are HOA fees which can also be paid by either party but are typically paid by the seller. Typically, the title company which is closing the transaction pays those fees (for status letter, documents, transfer fee, and more), so those fees are shown here as being reimbursed to the title company by the seller.

In addition to paying off the seller's loan, based on payoff numbers the title company obtains directly from the lender, the closer will deduct a few extra days of interest to cover the time it takes to get the payoff to the lender. If that's an overcharge, the seller will get a check for the surplus from the title company within a few weeks.

The title company will also withhold from seller's proceeds a few hundred dollars to pay the final water and sewer bill (unless water is included in the HOA dues), and will refund the excess after they pay the final water/sewer bill. This is the only utility which the title company pays and transfers on your behalf, because an unpaid water/sewer bill would result in a lien against the property, and the title company's job is to assure the buyer that they are getting the home free of any liens.

Now let's look at the buyer's settlement statement. If the buyer were paying cash, he or she would have very few expenses other than recording the deed for $10. The biggest costs associated with buying the home are related to the loan, especially if the seller has paid the buyer's real estate agent and paid for the owner's title policy.

Those loan costs are large and varied, as is detailed in the buyer's settlement statement above. There's the origination fee, from which the loan officer is paid. There is also the cost of appraising the home (in this case paid prior to closing), underwriting, credit report, flood certification, and other lesser fees.

The buyer's lender wants to be sure the home is insured, so you see that debit on the last line of the buyer's settlement.

Not only does the buyer have to pay all those expenses, the buyer is charged for a title policy that covers the lender for the amount of the loan ($500 in this case) and a loan closing fee ($450). The lender usually wants to escrow for property taxes and insurance and will require a deposit for both those expenses that will vary depending on when in the calendar year the closing takes place. In this case the buyer is being debited for 3 months of insurance coverage and 5 months of property taxes.

There is one big credit which the buyer receives from the seller. The funds which were deducted from the seller's proceeds for the current year's property taxes are credited to the buyer, not paid to the county. That's because the buyer will be charged the current year's entire property tax bill when it becomes due. You see that credit — almost $3,000 — near the top of the above settlement statement.

There could also be a concession for repairs that the seller agreed to in the inspection resolution, although not in this case. Sometimes that concession takes the form of a price reduction, which does not appear as a line on the settlement statement.

Notice that the closing services (Notary) fee of $360 is shared 50/50 in this case, as is commonly done, $180 for each party.

As mentioned above, visit our blog for more readable copies of those documents and more discussion of transaction costs.
